A letter from Baltimore in the New York Herald says that the trade between the Confederate States and Bermuda "is immense and that new vessels are constantly engaging in it. The profits of the business are so great that the parties concerned in it can afford the occasional loss or capture of a vessel with her cargo; but, in point of fact, captures are rare."

The New York Times says ultimately frost that has spread such damage through the corn fields of the West, has absolutely ruined the meagre and weakly stand of cotton that has been secured, and not a bale will be raised north of the Ohio River. Very large loss and considerable disappointment will be experienced. The culture of cotton is not possible in this country, north of the upper line of the State of Tennessee, and even in this latter State the crop is not always a sure one."

A few days since twenty-four guerrillas dashed into Charleston, Mo., early in the morning, and completely emptied two stores of their contents.
